

BACKGROUND

The setting, promotion, ratification and supervision of international labour standards (ILS), which cover a wide range of subjects in the world of work and are tripartite and universal in character, remains fundamental to the mission of the International Labour Organization (ILO). ILS are adopted by the tripartite International Labour Conference and take the form of Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols. Conventions are international treaties that are open to ratification by member States. By ratifying them, member States formally undertake to make their provisions effective, both in law and in practice, and to report on their application at regular intervals. Recommendations are non-binding instruments which provide guidance for national policy, legislation and practice. Protocols are partial and optional revisions or amendments of earlier Conventions. Since the foundation of the ILO in 1919, 407 instruments have been adopted.

Once ILS are adopted, member States are required under the ILO Constitution to submit them to the competent national authority (normally the parliament) on appropriate action. In the case of Conventions and Protocols, this means consideration for ratification. More than 8,450 ratifications have been registered so far.

The ILO has an authoritative supervisory system for monitoring the application of ILS in law and practice, which is unique at the international level. The supervisory system is based on the evaluation by independent experts of the manner in which obligations are complied with and on the examination of cases by the ILO bodies. If problems in the application of ILS persist, the ILO seeks to assist countries through social dialogue and technical assistance.

As countries strive for a human-centred approach to a work of work in need of resolute action to promote social justice and to fully implement the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, ILS provide a tried and trusted normative foundation to guide member States in the current context, characterized by a convergence of risks of unprecedented magnitude. ILS support policy coherence, provide a level playing field within and across countries to push back at inequalities, drive productivity gains needed to sustain decent standards of living, and regenerate trust in an open global economy that leaves no one behind.
